

Chevron Employees Lend a Helping Hand

Dan Descalzo, Chevron: What – you want me to help? All right! If I have it to give, then I'll give it. I'm Dan Descalzo. I'm a business analyst for Chevron's Information Technology Company, and I'm really excited because this is my second year helping with Chevron Volunteer Week. I'm here at the Food Bank of Contra Costa and Solano. We're here today to help load some food for the local agencies that are partners with the food bank. I'm excited to learn more about this agency and how they help the community. Chevron Volunteer Week is a great time for the thousands of Chevron employees to give back to the community. Here we go. A heavy one. Here you go. You're welcome. Here you go. You're welcome.

Larry Sly, Food Bank of Contra Costa and Solano: So my name is Larry Sly. I'm the executive director of the Food Bank of Contra Costa and Solano. Volunteers are the be-all and end-all, frankly, of what makes the food bank work. Chevron people come here and then build a relationship with the food bank and help us carry out our work, and Chevron has been one of our best partners in the world, no question about it. I mean, they really understand their role in the community and what they can do to help us execute our role in the community as well.

Dan: Want carrots? All right. What are you looking for? Good full ones? No splits? I've never seen so much – I've been to some big barbecues before, but I've never seen food move that fast. It's amazing how many people we were able to reach out to today, how fast those boxes of food went, and the great things that they will do for people.
